This was a very astute movement, but it was an open secret that the experts of the government had reported adversely upon the present location of the post-office, and had examined other sites than that east of the post-office building, and were favorably Virginia suffragists heard first-hand impressed with them as suitable for what happened to the suffrage move- a new post-office building, a step, as ment when it came up for discussion in , contemplated in the provisions of the SITES WERE FULLY HEARD Under these circumstances, a board meeting of the chamber was promptly called on the 19th instant to take such action as was deemed necessary in the premises, and also to afford the committee appointed at the meeting of citizens, held on the 18th, an oppor-tunity to present their resolutions and views to the board, which it was understood they proposed to do. But up to 12 o'clock on the 19th instant no notice had been received by the officers of the chamber from this committee, so the board sent them an invitation to the purpose of meeting them. In response to this invitation, Robert E. Magill, Dr. Jud B. Wood and others appeared and were heard fully, but the board of the chamber saw no reason to change its attitude, and, therefore, reaffirmed its former action and proceeded to appoint a representative delegation to visit Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of an appointment which had been previously made with him.

On that occasion, when, in addition to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Newton, the assistant secretary, the Senators from Virginia and the Congressman from this district were present an entirely satisfactory conclugressman from this district were present, an entirely satisfactory conclusion was reached, namely, that there should be a reinspection of the postoffice and the situation in Richmond, and that Mr. Newton, assistant secretary of the treasury and an official of the Post-Office Department would visit Richmond in the near future for that purpose.
